RE: Support of landmark designation for Church of Most Holy Redeemer, 173 East 3rd Street

Dear Vice Chair Master:

The Preservation League of New York State writes in support of Village Preservation's campaign to designate the Church of the Most Holy Redeemer, 173 East 3rd Street in Manhattan, as an individual landmark. Constructed in 1852, the building features a mix of Baroque-Romanesque and Byzantine Revival styles. Originally boasting a 250-foot-tall steeple (the tallest structure in the city at the time), it was lowered in 1902 but remains a fixture of the East Village skyline.

Beyond its architectural significance, we are particularly interested in this building's connection to the neighborhood's immigrant history. Most Holy Redeemer was established by the Redemptorist Fathers in 1844 to serve New York City's sizable German immigrant population when this section of the East Village was known as Kleindeutschland, or "Little Germany." At the turn of the 20th century, the neighborhood's German population was declining, and immigrants from other countries were starting to settle in the neighborhood in large numbers. By mid-century, Spanish-speaking Catholics formed the majority of the Most Holy Redeemer congregation, and today, the church is popularly known as Iglesia Santisimo Redentor-Natividad.

The church has recently halted masses at the site, leaving its future in doubt. As an architecturally and culturally significant cornerstone of the East Village, the Church of the Most Holy Redeemer has served the community for over a century and half, and we urge the Commission to designate this building as an individual landmark.

Sincerely,
